MILITARY MACHINE

The American Magazine seat Will Irwin to Europe at the outbreak of the war and the November number publishes an article by him entitled "The Wreckage of War," in which he describes vividly what he personally saw. He witnessed the final destruction of Louvain. He talked with soldiers and officers, saw citizens taken out to be shot, and heard the boom of cannon and rapid fire guns. In the following passage taken from his article Irwin describes some of the wonders of the German military machine as he observed it in Louvain:

"In glimpses here and there, we witnessed the thorough manner in which the German army takes possession of a conquered town. Plainly, they knew every alley, every seat of municipal activity, in this city which they had come to conquer. Within an hour the generals, the princeling who accompanied this army, and the higher staff officers had been assigned to quarters at the Table Ronde, the fashionable club of Louvain. Their eternal, gray automobiles had unloaded their kit, the servants of the club were at work getting dinner.

"The staff officers were at the best hotels in the city; one could not get within a block of the entrance.

"That night one of us saw the headquarters of the general staff. They had gone straight to the Palais de Justice, the court house of Louvain, and taken immediate and familiar posconsist of a thorough grading of the session. A battery of typewriters, road and providing adequate drainage manned by soldier and civillan clerks, was hard at work. Long before that the windows and walls bore a proclamation in Prench and Flemish, announcing the names of three hostages summer, causing auto tourists great havior of the town, and commanding along the printing press which turned completed the test.
